SEMINAR BACKGROUND

The Geeta Institute of Law is organizing a Seminar on the topic “Role of Welfare State in Eliminating Environmental Hazards and Promoting Sustainable Development” and proudly invites keynote speakers from leading Universities across the Globe. The seminar aims to provide a platform for discussion on the protection of environment that is, for the sustenance of living beings, as important as the protection of fundamental rights of the citizens of the country. Environment is something which is inherent with the basic needs of a human being that is the “right to survival” and “good health”. For this purpose, what is needed is the preservation & maintenance of a clean and sustainable environment that is not only foundational for human beings but also for other stakeholders in the entire environmental cycle. Environment includes everything which affects the balance of the nature and also of the atmosphere attached thereto by the irresponsible acts of the people and that have ultimately long ending effects on the nature and a non-apparent path which is full of toxic like environment is created for the present and future generations.

Although there are many National and International Laws and Regulations in the form of Legislations, Treaties and Conventions which have been put into effect by respective nations individually and collectively, however, there is a need to revisit the idea of “welfare state”. The continuing growth (celebrated) of economic super-structures has time and again unveiled many evils dug under the protected shield of the concept called “welfare state”. Consequently, the state’s quest for “welfare of all” many a time seems to succumb to these evils (including environmental hazards & degradation). What can also not be undermined is the state’s duty (a part of welfare state) to provide basic amenities (such as employment & infrastructure) to its citizens; undeniably, achieving a balance between environmental protection and fulfilment of its duties becomes difficult.

Therefore, “sustainable development” is one of those tools which the state applies in order to achieve the very objective of being a “welfare state”. These tools, on the one hand, diminish the very fear of environmental hazards and on the other, further the idea of a “welfare state” along with a clean and healthy environment. With this background, the International Seminar focuses on as to how the present idea of “welfare state” is being challenged by tremendous environmental hazards and how the state deploys more significant channels through which it preserves & promotes the environment.
